EUROPE

Medieval Europe marked a period of innovation and knowledge transfer, especially in France and Western regions once part of the Roman Empire. Following the collapse, these territories established their own realms, each governed by their kings. Artisans, having learned veneering under Roman rule, persisted in applying these techniques post-independence.

Furthermore, the independence gained by Eastern European countries, including Hungary, Portugal, Germany, France, England, and Spain, allowed for the continuation and adaptation of veneer applications. As these regions asserted their cultural identities, veneering became an integral part of their artistic heritage. The cultural and economic interconnections in medieval Europe thus contributed to the widespread adoption of wood veneer, leaving an indelible mark on the craftsmanship of the time.
